

Talking Science with Journalists

Catherine Meyers, American Institute of Physics

We live in a time when the human race has accumulated more information than ever before. But we are also awash in misinformation, conspiracy theories, distortions, and outright lies.

Scientists can and should be a public voice of clarity. I present some tips for getting journalists and the public to notice your work, and what to do when they start asking questions.